

Bachelor of Arts in Communication Studies (Interpersonal Communication)

About This Program

The Bachelor of Arts in Communication Studies (Interpersonal Communication) program empowers students to explore and master the complexities of human interaction in interpersonal contexts. Through engaging coursework in areas such as interpersonal communication, group dynamics, rhetorical analysis, persuasion, business communication, and public speaking, students develop a versatile communication skill set that bridges theory and real-world application. This program provides a comprehensive foundation in the principles of human communication, helping students understand the communicative self, analyze how people share and interpret information, and effectively articulate ideas across various platforms. Students gain the ability to craft and deliver compelling, audience-specific messages while honing their skills in professional communication writing and presentation. Rooted in experiential learning, the program equips students with practical tools and confidence to excel in communication-intensive careers such as business, education, public relations, and more.

Competencies

1. Upon completion of this major, students will have competency in analyzing audience characteristics to construct and deliver effective messages tailored to both small and large audiences, while demonstrating confidence and adaptability in public speaking.
2. Upon completion of this major, students will have competency in formulating persuasive messages in both interpersonal and public communication contexts, using evidence-based arguments and rhetorical strategies.
3. Upon completion of this major, students will have competency in creating well-structured written materials for various purposes, including reports, training plans, interview questions, and presentation outlines.
4. Upon completion of this major, students will have competency in designing and conducting probing, persuasive, survey, and employment interviews with an emphasis on strategic questioning and active listening.
5. Upon completion of this major, students will have competency in applying teamwork skills to collaborate effectively in diverse group settings and achieving shared goals.
